From: The Briefing from Lexipol
To: jlrodrigues@bakersfieldpd.us
Subject: The Briefing --- Electronic Evidence
Date: Friday, April 12, 2019 10:10:48 AM

The Briefing: your source for leadership resources, safety tips, hot topics and thought-provoking webinars.

Email not displaying correctly?
View it in your browser.

Electronic Evidence

In a recent PoliceOne poll, 89% of law enforcement respondents said they have been videotaped by bystanders while on duty. In this issue of The Briefing, we're discussing the impact of electronic evidence. Cell phone video and surveillance system footage are often released by onlookers in the aftermath of use of force events, but there are limitations of its use as evidence. On the contrary, data recovered from a search warrant of a suspect's device(s) can prove to be significant evidence, but again, there are limitations - this time, in how the digital evidence is retrieved. Additionally, a newer form of video observation is becoming increasingly popular with public safety agencies - drones. Read more about the key areas for consideration to ensure their legal and safe use.

Conclusive Evidence? Some Thoughts on the Limitations and Influence of Video Evidence

Video footage is often released following a use of force incident, which the public tends to regard as objective, conclusive evidence. But it's not that simple. There are many limitations - technical limitations of the video itself, limitations of human decision-making in high-stress situations, and the impact of hindsight bias. Here are 7 considerations when making a public statement following an officer-involved shooting: Read More.

Fingerprints, Facial Recognition, Retinal Scans, Passcodes and the Fifth Amendment

Whether facing an investigation into human trafficking, drug distribution, criminal gang violence, or child sexual exploitation, investigators must come to grips with the Fourth and Fifth Amendment rules impacting access to digital evidence. Today nearly every major crime has some association with digital evidence - consider these cases as an illustration of the emerging constitutional doctrines: Read More.

Does Your Promotional Process Pass the Test?

Gordon Graham continues his discussion of the fourth pillar of success - supervision - as it relates to promoting the next generation of men and women in your agency. These future supervisors will enforce the rules and develop the policies and procedures of your organization. What kind of promotional process do you have in place? Read More.

Customer Corner

We recently merged with PoliceOne, the leading law enforcement learning management system. This means we now offer the largest library of online law enforcement training content in addition to the trusted policies you already use. With the PoliceOne Suite, you get a mission-critical learning program that complements your existing Lexipol policies.

Additional benefits include:

- Affordable and flexible ways to meet your training mandates through an extensive catalog of online courses
- 24/7 accessibility to a web-based records system to track and report all training (including roll call, classroom and field)
- Real-time, valuable custom courses and exams enhancing your training investment

There's never been a better time to take your officers' learning to the next level!

Contact us for more information.

3 You Might Have Missed

5 Considerations for a Law Enforcement Drone Policy [BLOG]

Today's Tip featuring Gordon Graham: Prison Rape Elimination Act (PREA) [VIDEO]

The PREA Imperative: Why & How ALL Jail Facilities Should Meet the Standards [ON-DEMAND WEBINAR]

Coming Soon

Safe Street Encounters: Threats, Human Performance Dynamics & the Law
Tuesday, April 30 at 1 pm ET/10 am PT

Join Lexipol and Force Science Institute to learn the threats officers face during contacts, critical human performance factors that impact these interactions and how these dynamics intersect with the law. Register Now!

More Upcoming Events...

Copyright © 2019, Lexipol, All rights reserved.
2801 Network Blvd, Suite 500, Frisco, TX 75034

update subscription preferences